Derrick Santini discovered photography as a teenager at Graham school in Scarborough. Keen to share his passion and knowledge with the current generation of young, local photographers, a group of Year 10 students from Graham school worked with Derrick to create the photographic artworks on display in this gallery. The title, GxD, was created by the students and translates as "Us collaborating with Derrick".

Their photographs examine the idea of being 'the viewer' and of being 'the viewed' to explore the relationship between themselves and the subjects they photographed. The students learned professional photographic techniques using SLR cameras in studio sessions at Woodend and on location in the Valley Gardens and around the Spa. They also learned how to shoot in natural and artificial light, how to frame their subjects and find geometry in the space around them, skills which helped them have greater creative control over the images they produced.

They have each selected a single image that they have created as an example of their work and as individual responses to the practical and critical considerations at play when a photograph is 'made'.
